Inhibition of alpha-adrenoceptor-mediated relaxation in canine pulmonary artery by substance P. The role of endothelial factors on neurogenic regulation of vascular tone was investigated in ring segments of the isolated canine pulmonary artery. The endothelium-derived relaxing factor(s) were removed from the arteries by brief exposure to de-endothelializing solution. Neurogenic relaxation in response to electrical field stimulation and substance P was unaffected by de-endothelialization, suggesting that the role of endothelium on neurogenic vasodilatation is minor. On the other hand, alpha-adrenoceptor-mediated vasodilatation in response to norepinephrine, acetylcholine and histamine was significantly depressed by de-endothelialization. The inhibitory effect of de-endothelialization on alpha-adrenoceptor-mediated vasodilatation was significantly antagonized by methyl-atropine, indicating that the inhibitory effect is not due to the direct action of the substance P released by de-endothelialization on vascular smooth muscle alpha-adrenoceptors. The inhibitory effect of de-endothelialization on neurogenic vasodilatation was significantly antagonized by atropine but not by indomethacin, indicating that the inhibitory effect is mediated by the release of a paracrine mediator, probably of cholinergic nature. These results suggest that endothelial factors may participate in neurogenic vasodilatation through a paracrine mediator. Q: Why aren't the first 4 bytes of my ascii string being read?
