The relative risk of dementia among relatives of Alzheimer's disease (AD) cases is well documented, but little is known about the specific risk associated with AD. Furthermore, few studies have investigated whether the risk of AD in relatives is influenced by a shared genetic or environmental risk factor. In this study, we investigated the concordance of dementia in parents, siblings, and offspring of AD cases. Using a case-control design, we studied 675 individuals in a two-generation family tree drawn from the community-based Religious Orders Study. AD subjects were diagnosed according to the National Institute of Neurological and Communicative Diseases and Stroke and Alzheimer's Disease and Related Disorders Association criteria. All individuals also underwent extensive neurological and neuropsychological evaluations. The age- and sex-adjusted odds ratios of AD in relatives of AD cases were 2.39 (95% CI 1.77-3.23) for siblings, 1.43 (95% CI 1.12-1.83) for parents, and 2.07 (95% CI 1.48-2.89) for offspring. The risk of AD in the offspring of AD cases was higher than the risk in the offspring of controls (OR = 1.48, 95% CI 1.02-2.14). We also found a positive association between AD in siblings and the AD in parents of the AD sibling (OR = 1.91, 95% CI 1.14-3.22). Our results suggest that AD in siblings is a risk factor for AD in parents. Furthermore, the risk of AD in offspring is influenced by the genetic risk factor in AD-affected parents. This finding suggests that shared genetic factors could influence the risk of AD in relatives, which could be one of the contributing factors to the familial aggregation of AD.The arch-conservative American Freedom Defense
