Description Eucalyptus simmonsii is a mallee that typically grows to a height of and forms a lignotuber. It has rough, flaky, greyish bark on the trunk, smooth greyish bark on the thinner branches, sometimes with flower stems and petioles. The fruit is a woody, cup-shaped, barrel-shaped or cylindrical capsule long and wide with the valves enclosed below the rim. Taxonomy and naming Eucalyptus simmonsii was first formally described in 1987 by Lawrie Johnson and Ken Hill in the journal Telopea from specimens collected near Mungindi. The specific epithet (simmonsii) honours Donald Simmons who collected the type specimens. Pulmonary interstitial emphysema (PIE) is characterized by the presence of air in the interstitial tissue around the terminal bronchioles. Although its prevalence was estimated to be 0.5-2%, it has become a common disease owing to the increasing prevalence of smoking worldwide. We investigated the risk factors and clinical outcomes of PIE. The data from 105 patients with PIE were collected from 13 regional thoracic units in Japan. PIE was associated
