A multi-modal microchip electrophoresis platform is developed, which is capable of monitoring protein precipitation and its underlying processes. In addition to the commonly used native and far-UV electrophoresis modes, a small volume sample injection process is incorporated to allow the precipitation of labeled protein targets, which are subsequently detected using a custom-designed CdSe/ZnS quantum dot optical detector. The detection sensitivity of up to 2 nM target proteins is achieved using CdSe/ZnS quantum dots with a maximum excitation wavelength of 330 nm, which corresponds to a path length of 25 microm in a microchip with a channel width of 16 microm and a length of 75 microm. The high precision and sensitivity of the microchip-based detection enables the on-chip visualization and quantification of the effects of electrostatic, hydrophobic, hydrophilic, and steric interactions upon protein precipitation. As the detection of precipitation and the underlying biochemical process is completed in less than a minute, our detection platform will provide a significant improvement in the rapid analysis of protein-protein and protein-ligand interactions that are critical steps in the development of drug discovery.Q: I dont know if I have shingles or a
