Heading into the 2016 campaign, Hillary Clinton—as she has since 2008—is expected to seek to win the Democratic presidential nomination as the candidate of a particular vision of American politics and society. Such visions of what America should be and mean, however—romantic and revolutionary, democratic and enlightened, militarist or democratic, nation-centered or world-centered—are not the province of the Democrats alone. Republican candidates have long been associated with such visions, too, but in recent years GOP-ers have tended to emphasize some version of protectionist, commercial, and entrepreneurial populism and protectionism. The last decade, however, has seen the emergence of a more ambitious, nation-centered vision of the United States. From Glenn Beck's The American Dream to The Tea Party: A Manifesto, from the even more incredible address of the Dalai Lama at the 2008 Republican National Convention to the secessionist, pro-Trump rhetoric of some far-right Republicans and their growing public support, the United States has witnessed a growing sense that the nation is endangered, that it is in need of regaining its “proud place in the world,” and that “the world will look to us for leadership.” Indeed, as a recent Public Religion Research Institute survey found, only 46 percent of Republicans now express a “great deal” of confidence in the United States’ ability to “achieve its best possible future,” compared to 68 percent of Democrats.
