A research study done by Red Hat Institute of Training and Development has found that Photoshop can be a barrier for people to get a job in the graphics and web design industry. According to the research, 43 percent of employers claim that Photoshop is a reason for not hiring potential candidates. Red Hat has also found that candidates who use other programs and have a portfolio usually have a better chance of getting an interview than those who use Photoshop. This is because most of the employers usually reject candidates who don't use Photoshop. If you too want to have a better job in graphic and web design, you're going to have to keep up with the trends. Q: Location of AssemblyInfo in Visual Studio There is a cool feature in Visual Studio that allows you to set the assembly info on a specific project without affecting anything else. I've seen it suggested that you set it up in the default template projects, but I don't think that's accurate. The only way to get it to occur is to have an AssemblyInfo.cs file, and put it in the root of the project. But the feature exists, when you go to Project > Properties > Application, the Assembly: build tag is under the Application tab. I've set it up to work in my current project, but I can't remember how to get it to deploy to my distribution. Any ideas? A: It's supposed to be in the.csproj file but there has been a lot of confusion around that. It is, as you've noticed, in the Application tab. Also, remember that in a solution, "project name" and "application" are not the same; the former can be something specific for one or more projects and the latter is whatever groupings of projects make up the application as a whole (i.e. the web site). This invention relates generally to automobile burglar alarm systems and more particularly to providing an anti-theft device to prevent tampering with the alarm. With the introduction of vehicles with various security devices, there has been an increase in the number of burglaries involving the vandalism or pilferage of the vehicle alarm system. Prior art burglary prevention devices typically have been little more than conventional alarms which are totally ineffective and have merely stolen batteries. The advent of sophisticated electronic equipment has greatly increased the value of pilferage and the need for burglary prevention. Modern day vehicle alarms are more sophisticated and have the ability to not only sound an alarm in the event of a burglary, but also provide a record of the event on a micro-computer. The use of sophisticated electronic equipment has in many ways increased the burglaries of vehicle alarms. Burglars are usually seen as usually facing only those vehicle alarm systems which are manually deactivated. While the sophistication of modern electronic equipment has made it possible to at least partially automate certain functions, these functions are susceptible to being hacked or deactivated and require manual setting. Thus, the sophistication of the electronic devices in modern vehicle alarms is their greatest disadvantage as it has led to the tremendous and escalating increase in the number of vehicle thefts, and theft of the contents of the vehicle

Q: How to generate an inequality between natural numbers? I have 3 sets of natural numbers: $A=\{1,3,4,5\}$ $B=\{1,3\}$ $C=\{1\}$ I want to create an inequality between them, i.e. $3 \in A \cap B \cap C$ Thus, the desired result should be true. I have tried with: `> a = Set[1, 3, 4, 5]; > b = Set[1, 3]; > c = Set[1];` However, I am not able to create the desired result. My code is:
